In order to obtain better models for this disease, we applied, for the first time, to in vivo human studies, a novel method for generating tissue-engineered, mucosa-like engineered oral mucosa (Mucosa-EEM), used as a model of human oral mucosa. This newly developed Mucosa-EEM was generated in vitro as a cutaneous equivalent of the oral mucosa; it comprised cultured human dermal fibroblasts (HFs) and epithelial cells (HEp3) from the epidermis and epithelial cells from the oral mucosa. After 21 days in culture, the Mucosa-EEM consisted of a stratified epithelium with goblet cells, a compact layer of collagen fibers and a dermal equivalent. We also characterized some aspects of wound healing in Mucosa-EEM. Specifically, we found that Mucosa-EEM develop epithelial invaginations that resemble tongue papillae and a wound healing process that is similar to normal mucosal epithelium. Our preliminary results suggest that Mucosa-EEM may be a valuable model for evaluating the effect of agents used to treat oral mucositis. Here, we propose to extend these studies to try to understand the mechanisms underlying the development of oral mucositis and in order to design therapeutic interventions. In this context, we will determine the impact of gamma-irradiation on the development of Mucosa-EEM. In Specific Aim 1, we will study the effect of single and fractionated doses of gamma-radiation on Mucosa-EEM. Based on our pilot data, we propose that Mucosa-EEM become more sensitive to irradiation with

A 45-year-old female with hepatocellular carcinoma (HCC) was admitted to our hospital for further examination of liver dysfunction, and by abdominal ultrasonography a hypoechoic mass was seen in S6, and the tumor measured about 5.1 x 3.7 cm in diameter. Upon admission, the CEA in the serum was elevated to 133 ng/ml. On laparotomy, a cirrhotic liver with massive HCC was found. At the time of operation, metastatic hepatic tumor was observed on the surface of the liver. Right hepatectomy was carried out and the histological diagnosis was HCC. Sixteen months later, multiple metastatic bone tumors were detected in the skull, thoracic vertebrae and ribs by bone scintigraphy. Neither primary lesions nor metastatic liver tumors were found in the patient by either computed tomography (CT) or magnetic resonance imaging (MRI). She died 15 months after admission for HCC. The main cause of death in this patient was metastatic bone tumor and diffuse pleural dissemination. The CEA level in the serum was elevated as the tumor grew and the patient died. We therefore suggest that not only the primary lesion, but also the metastatic liver tumor should be examined in order to establish a diagnosis for any tumor with metastasis.Dairy Queen Opens Up With New Food For Thought And Shake!
