Breast cancer is one of the most common cancer diagnoses in the world, although for many patients it can be cured. The aim of this study was to identify and describe the views of family physicians about early detection of breast cancer. The results are based on a survey of 600 family physicians working in the Stockholm County. Through an open-ended questionnaire the family physicians were asked for their views about early detection of breast cancer. Eighty-eight percent of the respondents said that early detection of breast cancer could save women's lives. In addition, the family physicians' views about the doctor-patient relationship was found to influence their recommendations for the appropriate age for screening. Only a few family physicians would recommend screening for early detection before the age of 30, while few would promote screening in older women. The majority of the respondents saw psychological, socio-cultural, as well as general and economic reasons for delaying early detection of breast cancer. The family physicians also saw lack of knowledge and confidence as important factors influencing their ability to offer early detection of breast cancer.
