With a colorful face and a fully-sealed cedar body, the Maple is a great choice for players who want a tone as rich, lively, and alive as its lush, sun-soaked, mother of all the fruits. The Maple model was created in 1970 by the designer Bert May. At the time, the company was looking for a relatively inexpensive model that had high-gloss. The Maple. Footage courtesy of Woodsong. Maple .1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to sporting equipment, and in particular to a buffer for coupling skis in motion to a motor driven tow bar such as the type normally used to tow skis. 2. Description of the Prior Art The sport of skiing has grown in popularity at an exceedingly fast pace. As a result, the equipment used to practice this sport has also grown increasingly sophisticated. Along with the use of more expensive equipment, it has now become conventional to mount ski training devices on a tow bar for ease of use by the novice skier. The training devices are generally in the nature of devices which will hold the skier's feet and legs in various configurations which simulate the skiing and roping motions. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 3,335,563 teaches a device which grips and supports the skier's feet. A brake is used to release the skier in a controlled manner. Another such device is U.S. Pat. No. 3,591,430. Briefly stated, the device comprises a transverse trough member with a foot-gripping member mounted within the trough member. A jaw-like member is pivotally attached to the trough member in a manner which will allow it to be moved to one side and the other for releasable holding of the skier's feet. The device is rigid and cumbersome. It is difficult to install and use. It is also somewhat expensive. Another such training device is shown in U.S. Pat. No. 3,579,300. This is a rigid unit which is difficult to use for practice purposes and is very expensive. U.S. Pat. No. 3,611,654 discloses a somewhat more portable device which is somewhat easier to use but still relatively expensive. A simple, low-cost yet effective ski training device is needed. SVG◆
