A program that enables you to remove device entries quickly and easily, in addition to letting you know when a device was last used. When Skype moved to Windows 8, they got rid of the cute little envelope icon on the taskbar for the main window of the app. They replaced it with a blocky square with a message that, if you click it, says "Refresh." It must be that they wanted to play off the slightly unnerving whole Metro UI thing. But this doesn't work. The icon in its place for the main window doesn't change when Skype calls or texts come through, so it's all the same as before. The only way you'll know that there's a Skype call going on in the background is if you click the gray areas along the top and bottom of the main window, and a message saying "Chat with Skype” pops up. Clicking it brings you to the conversation window. Now, be honest: If you used Skype, a piece of software so annoying as to make you drop it like a wet fish, that’s what you were going to do. If you used it for two years without opening its main window, why would you care? Like any Windows app, when you remove Skype from your taskbar, it doesn’t go away — it’s still running in the system tray, just as you left it. It just looks terrible. You can remove it, but it does you no good. Not so with the old version of Skype. There, it still works, but with a lot less of the random bullshit that exists now. It’s more of a bot than it used to be, but you can get it back. It used to just tell you, when there was a Skype call, which contacts were on it and which ones weren’t. Now it also has a bot interface that allows you to address, if not entirely control, an entire conversation. It’ll even tell you when the person you're calling is online, even if he or she isn't. You can turn this feature off if you want. But it's still there That's not all — it has a tab for the person you're calling. If they're online, you can tell them where you are and how to get to you. That's
