“Being sent to spy on Patty the Dark Dragon’s Tavern is a crap-shoot. The meekest spy at the start of the game could be the agent most suited to infiltrate the tavern and survive long enough to report back to the Ministry of Safety. You have been tasked to investigate whether a possible escape route exists, or if Patty the Dragon is planning to harvest someone for lunch. Your primary means of gathering information will be playing darts at the meandering and inept bartender, but sometimes an off-the-wall spy is worth their weight in gold.” Originally published on TheGeek. “Having trouble getting hold of a controller? You might have to make one at the push of a button.” That’s the opening sentence of this small, simple game, which might well introduce the meaning of the phrase, ‘upcycled’. I first heard of Marenian Tavern Story,

RPGamer's 2017 Excellence in Visual Art awarded game, at the last Indie World Convention, held in September this year at Guildford Convention Centre, London. The software was later released in October 2017. And the Guildford event, a successful event for Indie-RPG developers, was quite an event. A handful of games, out of the 100 entrants, performed well, with 'Dora the Explorer', created by 'Indigo Codes'(aka 'Indigo Interactive') being a particularly noteworthy and well received entry. Then, less than two months later, the theme for Indie World Games 2017, based at the Barbican, was announced: 'Enduring entertainment'. The British indie-RPG developer, 'Hooks Up Games', was the only named developer. When I saw the announcement of 'Marenian Tavern Story', I wasn't that surprised. Hooks Up Games have always been interested in old style RPGs, with their 'The Name of the Rose' being just a few of the games I've played.

They also have the kind of opportunity-rich career as most indie-RPG developers, with 'The Name of the Rose' having been released on every single console. As indie games go, Marenian Tavern Story is definitely different. Part of the 'Indie World' event, this entry was just a random connection and discussion topic at Guildford.
