What's new in HotGirls Sliding Puzzle - ArtBook:

The Drunken Wrestlers () is a painting by the Italian Renaissance artist Raphael that was begun in 1505 and continued and completed in 1515. It now resides in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence. The painting depicts a group of Venetian aristocrats, satirists and poets gathered around an unnamed musician in a tavern. In the center of the room a couch with a couple reclines, one half of the pair has caught a flask of wine to their mouth, the other rests their head on the couch's arm. Around the couch, showing the influence of Venetian society's activities, sits a lay sister and a mendicant friar, and in the background the patrons and musicians jest and play instruments, including a bagpipe with which a drunken man is playing. The protagonists of the scene are a Venetian nobleman, a non-noble member of the patrician class and a male philosopher, a figure believed to represent Burckhard von Cranz (1476–1527), a German Augsburger humanist writer. We also see the female philosopher Ercole Paganino, an Italian female thinker, in a pose similar to that of Burckhard, holding a lute. The painting's moralistic interpretation is stated in the painting's title, which indicates that the moral for the men is being taught by the women. The poet and playwright Girolamo Bardi is seen in the background on the bottom shelf of a window, and in the work's original title alcova refers to the standard of his window. (Although this commentary has been interpreted as evidence that the scene was initially dedicated to René of Montmorency, this interpretation was proven to be false in 1994 by Ivo Fritsche.) The painting is a loose adaptation of one of the thirty-five pieces of Michelangelo's series of Drunken Silenus. Raphael adapted the composition to the painting itself, and the apparent digression he made in the old philosopher's drunkenness from the character of the original is the most obvious change in the piece. Raphael's characterization of figures is more allegorical than Michelangelo's, providing a broader context and underlying meaning. The dialogue and the large scale adaptivity are characteristic of the painter's dialectic style. Composition, symbolism and interpretation The immediate audience for the painting is the patrons with the Greek word in the bottom right
