What is CIDDED-UP To crack a CIDDED-UP, users must take a photo of the enrollment card using an electronic device (phone, webcam, etc.) with the following line of text and the photo will be sent via email to the person's email address that is on the card.
"The so-called photo id cards are merely used to mark out the citizens for administrative purposes. Since then the town hall has made things difficult for many. In the light of this, protesters stormed the National Police HQ in Phnom Penh and broke up to 34 ledgers of voter cards. The numbers of illegal vote cards were counted on and the results were expected for 2017 general elections. The protesters also smashed computers and devices used for the registration process. Some of the confiscated documents have been left on the pavement in front of Police HQ to be retrieved by the end of the day. Witnesses claimed that the police used tear gas and rubber bullets to disperse the protesters at the National Police HQ. However, the police said they only fired live ammunition in response to a violent crowd. A police official added that all statements made by the protesters were false and that the confiscated documents have now been safely stored at the police station to be used for the election." "It is important for authorities and residents to be open to the challenges of the new technology, rather than trying to crack down or prevent it. They should change policies if they uncover or spot abusive use of technologies,"
