III. The effect of starvation. A single injection of corn oil into the rat results in a significant increase in plasma triglyceride concentration which continues for up to 48 h but does not increase further after that time. The principal change in the intracellular accumulation of triglyceride in the liver following an injection of corn oil is an accumulation in the form of triglyceride droplets. Starvation increases the concentration of plasma triglycerides for 24 h or more but has little effect on the accumulation of triglyceride in the liver.Q: Parallel computing with Java I am beginner in parallel computing. I started reading parallel computing with Java by James Gosling, and currently reading a section on fork-join pattern. My question is: how to execute many computational steps in parallel in java without using any multi-threading? If someone has a good reference on this, please provide it. Thanks a lot. A: Several options: JNA (JNA.org): JNA allows an unmanaged class to call a C/C++ function/method. You can call the native methods using JNA, which then allows you to parallelize your execution with any language you want. JNA is Java's equivalent to Java Native Access (JNA) and it makes it easy to call C++ from Java. Java Native Interface (JNI): If you have a choice, this would be the best solution. JNI allows Java code to call native C/C++ code directly. This allows you to do parallel processing with native C/C++ code, which is probably slower than Java code. JNI is Java's equivalent to JNA. Thread Local Storage (TLS): One way to parallelize your execution is to use thread-local storage. This would be the most memory-intensive method, but it can be effective. A: The Java EE world offers one of the best libraries for parallel computing:
