Pope Benedict XVI "is generally honest about people's personal shortcomings, but not about his own," author Frank Schaeffer said. | AP Photo Schaeffer on Vatican: Pope has not yet excommunicated John McCarrick Frank Schaeffer, the conservative author and former president of the group called the National Association of Evangelicals, said that while he still does not understand the thinking inside the Vatican on some theological issues, he believes Pope Benedict XVI's resignation may have been an act of conscience. "This is a spiritual man who has struggled with power, who is hesitant about taking his own life," Schaeffer told POLITICO. "If you think this was related to the McCarrick abuse, then you're thinking that his conscience is at work here," referring to the former cardinal's alleged sexual misconduct with seminarians and priests. "I don't understand the ecclesiology of the church, but I do know this: a pope who has granted more men like John 'indulgences' than exorcisms...he can't be implicated in a McCarrick cover-up," he added. In April 2010, Benedict accepted the resignation of McCarrick as a cardinal. "I think it has to do with the inefficiency of the church he's inherited. He's hoping that this will be the church's lead pastor," Schaeffer said. "He would prefer to be [the] head of a parish, but he realizes he's got to serve at the top of the papacy." In mid-March, the Vatican said it had found new evidence of McCarrick's abuse. But, in remarks on Wednesday, Pope Benedict XVI said he had no memory of McCarrick, saying the former cardinal had been archbishop of Washington when he became pope, which would make no sense. In an interview with ZENIT.org that will be published Thursday, Schaeffer is expected to discuss Benedict's resignation. Schaeffer, who co-wrote "He Shall Reign" with his father, the late Francis Schaeffer, said he believes Benedict XVI "is generally honest about people's personal shortcomings, but not about his own." "I think he's
