Some can be adjusted and others can also be added or removed, according to users' preferences. Impressive currency database, which allows one to perform a custom selection The application features an impressive cryptocurrency database, which allows users a high degree of flexibility when it comes to selecting their preferred ones for monitoring. We believe that the simple selection process makes things quite easy and straightforward when configuring the app. Last but not least, we also enjoyed the fact that essential features, such as decimal rounding for displaying the rates, are also provided, as well as a default currency denomination. Useful tool for those who wish to keep track of bitcoin and other cryptocurrencies' rates, directly from their desktops Lightweight Crypto Price Tracker can provide a reliable way of keeping track of cryptocurrency and corresponding rates and fluctuations, through the use of a minimalist desktop display bar. Uber says it has filed a lawsuit against Massachusetts over a new law that would effectively ban the company from picking up passengers in the state. On Friday, the company said it was suing to prevent the law from taking effect. It would force Uber to pay drivers as employees instead of independent contractors. Related: Here's what Uber is betting on in 2020 Uber says this would not only hurt its driverless car program, but would put the company out of business. The company argues that the drivers are independent contractors. It says it does not benefit from drivers picking up passengers. "By illegally requiring Uber to treat drivers as employees, Massachusetts is forcing the Company to shut down its entire business in the Commonwealth," the company said in a statement. "We are confident that we will ultimately prevail in the courts because the drivers are independent contractors, not employees," it added. Uber says in its lawsuit that it is seeking a temporary restraining order and a preliminary injunction to prevent the law from taking effect. Related 3a67dffeec
