The authors systematically reviewed the literature to identify studies of physical activity interventions in children and adolescents with cancer. Despite the limited number of studies to date, findings suggest that physical activity can be safely provided for children and adolescents with cancer and may be an important part of their ongoing care. Pediatric cancer survivors are at an increased risk for premature aging, reduced quality of life, and development of chronic disease as a result of physical activity. Certain risk factors, such as gender and illness stage, should be considered when designing and implementing physical activity interventions. Future randomized controlled trials of physical activity interventions in pediatric cancer are warranted to confirm the effectiveness of these programs and to understand the factors that contribute to their success. if (right > left) return false; return true; } / * Tests this matrix for equivalence, and if so returns * {@code true}. * * @param obj the object to test for equivalence with. * @return {@code true} if the two objects are equivalent. */ @Override public boolean equals(final Object obj) { if (obj == this) { return true; } if (obj instanceof RationalMatrix) { RationalMatrix m = (RationalMatrix) obj; if (m.getDiagonal() != null) { if (!getDiagonal
