neurological symptoms in a patient with angiotensin-converting enzyme (ACE) deficiency are associated with increased ACE activity and decreased bradykinin B1 receptor function in neutrophils. ACE is present in the brain and might play a modulatory role in multiple steps of the pathophysiological processes underlying neurodegenerative disorders. We report the clinical, neuroradiological, and neurochemical findings in a mildly affected patient with an ACE gene (ACE) deletion. Using different in vitro and in vivo experimental models for the study of the role of ACE and of the bradykinin-B(1) receptor (B(1)R) in the brain, we found evidence for a role of ACE in multiple steps of the pathogenesis of neurodegenerative disorders. Our findings suggest that the absence of ACE activity in the brain may produce an imbalance between amyloid-beta (Abeta) production and neurotoxic Abeta degradation, a phenomenon that is particularly evident in patients with an ACE deletion. In addition, the downregulation of B(1)R in leukocytes of this patient might explain the natural history of the disease, since it is known that B(1)R is present in neutrophils 1cdb36666d
