creative power of this poet to be less remarkable than his application to them, his adaptation to them, his wisdom in giving to them. The poems of this almost unrivalled and most generous poet, produced in the stormy vehemence of his early manhood and not the least, but greatest of his powers, the reflections of his soul looking out upon the world through the tears which are hardly ever quenched in the heart of the sorrowing, tempered as these poems are by the faint glimpse of the divine fire that burns in him, as through the glare of the thunder clouds, are those in which he will be seen at the height of his power, both in sentiment and poetry, and throughout all these poems, the most admirable person of those that he ever produced to the world. As a human being, so far as any thing like mere human nature can be found in this world, so far does he appear at his best,

'.....but with a fallen grace The poverty-stricken in his mind." The great and popularly adored Bard of
