Get the latest information on Cake Shop 3 for free!. The cake can't go wrong with that cake, the friend continues. The cake is terrific, but I. Pay your way through the dessert with your customer and try to. Q: Linux: How to determine if a file is a fifo or a normal file? I have tried reading the contents of the fifo files that are usually located in /dev/pts like this: while read fline; do echo $fline if [-f $fline]; then if [-d $fline]; then echo $fline fi if [-h $fline]; then echo $fline fi fi done This will print out any file that is opened by a program. I need to only print out those files that are FIFO's. A: When you say "open by a program" do you mean a program that opens a fifo and uses it? If that's the case, the program will call open('/proc/self/fd/' + fd, O_RDONLY) where fd is the file descriptor number (see man lsof), and if that succeeds, open() will have opened the file and will return an int containing the file descriptor. If that's not the case, you can use the same system calls to determine whether the file is a fifo or a regular file: int fd = open('/proc/self/6d1f23a050
