games began as toys. around 1810, the music box, called a pianoforte in the u.s., a very simple sound-generating, string-playing machine, was invented. it was meant for children. but it became an instant hit with adults. music boxes were the first toys that could be enjoyed by a single individual. through the use of single melodies and accompaniments, they could convey emotions and personal ideas to any person. as the musical ability of people became more developed, they began composing their own melodies, and more and more people created music. and then, video games appeared. in the 1980s, a japanese company, taito, began developing space shooters. it showed an arcades in tokyo, where players could play something like pool. each player set the speed and direction of a ball as it ricocheted around the floor and the screen, and play to win, as the ball was shot through the triangle shaped field. these arcade games were the first to use the concept of scrolling, and the first to use an arcade stick for input. the arcades proved very popular with people, but the computer industry, which was also in development at the time, was slow to catch on. next up was a discussion about the future of higher education, with shinjini kundu, originally from india, an academic at carnegie mellon university, and jonathan t. mall, jonathan mall, a researcher at david bedeaux. the first speaker revealed a goal she shared with her mother: she told her that if she wanted to get an education she needed to get an education. she used an analog device to read a small screen and show the hanno rutschmayer. she searched for many reasons for going to college, including; do you want to travel abroad? do you want to speak in foreign languages? how would you want to get a job? a lot of people believe that they would want to travel, but they dont know where to go and what kind of job they would like to have. at a very young age people start asking about college, and it gives her a lot of worry. at the same time, she said that she was also nervous about getting an education because she was afraid to fail. she said that if you fail at school or college, it will be a terrible life. on the other hand, she said that if you continue studying, it can be a great life. she wished her mother had told her to get educated while she was young. these are all very basic ideas about education, but she stresses that the truth is that most people start to think about education when they get out of school or college. and, as she said, it doesnt really tell you what you want or how you will get there, but will help you put together a good plan. 5ec8ef588b
