Website crawler that identifies SEO-related issues Download details: Great Features to Look for in a Cloud Service Provider Cloud computing, also known as cloud computing, cloud services, or web services, is a paradigm of information technology services in which shared resources, software and information are provided to computers and other devices on-demand, like the Internet. These services are said to provide "computing as a utility," that is, via the Internet. Many cloud service providers are changing the way businesses do their work, a shift that has never been easier. There are many cloud service providers that have come up and the list of them keeps on growing. The difference between cloud service providers is very thin and there is not much to consider when choosing a cloud service provider.

However, there are features that you can expect from cloud service providers. You may or may not be aware of it, but the Information Technology of today is dominated by Cloud Computing. As in the past the rise of cloud computing has been happening with the help of the Digital Economy Bill and the current plans of the industry. Though the name Cloud Computing may seem very new, the concept itself is actually rather ancient. It has been used by several great civilizations like the ancient Egyptians and Greeks, the medieval times, and even the caveman. Of course, it is true that it has been around for a very long time but the significance it has today cannot be denied. Cloud Computing is actually a term that refers to the usage of a computer resource via the Internet. There is a plethora of tools in the internet that you can use for free, without paying a penny, but the real advantage is that you do not need a large computer with a high cost of electricity to use them. Cloud computing is a form of outsourcing your data processing to online servers. This enables you to easily access your data no matter where you are. The idea of working with the cloud is simple: you simply log onto the servers of the cloud service provider and it gives you the accessibility of your data. This is very attractive to the IT professionals as the data is stored on a remote server which will not be under their control. The very first cloud computing systems were developed by NASA in order to have a way of storing large amounts of data and sharing it with other scientists. The first cloud computing system was developed by
