I'm new to python and have gone through some of the basics. My questions are the following: (1) I have a program which has 4 classes and I'm working in a method (essentially a function) of the 3rd class which has a variable name = "Bob" (2) How do I access this variable in the 4th class? A: Probably you want to have a common class/object to store the name that you declared in your method. Here's an example of how you could do it. I created a class called "Person" that has a variable named "name" and a method "setName", that sets the name of the class Person. Then I created a class called "Worker" that has a variable "name" and a method "setName" that uses the method setName in the Person class. Here's the code of both classes and the main program: from person import Person class Person: def __init__(self, name): self.name = name def setName(self, name): self.name = name class Worker: def __init__(self, name): self.name = name def setName(self, name): Person.setName(self, name) def main(): person = Person("Bob") worker = Worker("Alice") worker.setName("Joe") print(worker.name) if __name__ == '__main__': main() OUP
