And probably most exciting for anyone who uses Chrome, the software can run inside the browser! Those lucky enough to be given a developer preview would like to know that all of the software's new features are available for testing, and that conversation has already begun on Stack Exchange. I've been using VIM for three years now. The software was acquired by the company from its creator, VIM, back around 1989. Today, VIM is one of the standard editors for the Linux operating system. I want to share with you some of the reasons why I love VIM. VIM is extremely powerful. I'm amazed at how much power the VIM editor has, and how well it performs. I'm an advanced user of Emacs, and I can use the full power and flexibility of Emacs whenever I want to. VIM, however, can do the same and even more. I can program directly inside VIM with my command line programming tools. It's almost equivalent to Python. I get to see exactly what I'm doing. VIM is a Lisp machine for text editing. VIM works is way that is completely different than what Emacs does. I've rewritten my code using my VIM in the same way I would write it using a real Lisp machine in my office. The classic ideas that a Lisp programmer or software engineer thinks of—fold, change, jump, surprise and so on—all can be used in VIM. This will allow you to do some amazing programming directly inside of VIM. If you are more familiar with the coding environment of other editors like Emacs, this may be a transition for you. After you learn these features, you will see what I am talking about.

So if your explanations are to span throughout the whole article I would like to know at what point the article becomes long of articles and the links etc. If anyone happens to know I am so grateful.
