Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a radio communication device, more particularly, to a radio communication device that performs parallel transmission of an information signal. 2. Description of the Related Art In radio communication, it is necessary to convert an input information signal into the form suitable for transmission to the radio station. The input signal is first subjected to the electric power amplification and further converted to a radio signal. For such a conversion process, a power amplifier of a transmission unit is generally used. One example of an amplification circuit is a class A amplifier. The class A amplifier has such a configuration that amplifies the input signal linearly as a function of the amplitude level of the input signal. However, a class A amplifier has problems that conversion efficiency is low and a space is required for arranging a bias circuit. As a result, it is difficult to reduce the overall size of a radio communication device using the class A amplifier. One solution for overcoming these problems is a class AB amplifier. In a class AB amplifier, an amplifying circuit is operated nonlinearly to lower the
