Final thoughts: This reviewer was impressed with the features as well as the overall performance of the program. The lack of support for X-Trans sensors was a sore point with this reviewer. However, if you're a casual user who isn't concerned with that yet, it was evident this program is robust enough to get the job done. If you're a truly advanced user, Photoshop is more than capable. The last release brought with it some welcome features, such as new brushes, presets, and features, as well as improvements to the overall UI. This reviewer is a long-time Lightroom user, but if you're starting from scratch, this would be the choice to make. A group of CIA analysts are using their Google Plus accounts to discuss concepts and ideas related to their work, some of which are "classified for official dissemination only," according to one of the posts making the rounds. Apparently the NSA uses discussions like these to help refine their plans as well. The chat is highly classified, and if you try to read it, it will bring up a red block reading "This list [or item] is a restricted topic. Only approved GCPs [Google Plus Community Partners] can view or post here." The purpose of what the CIA is trying to do is because every one of them is running a Google Plus account, meaning they're online. They only need someone to hack those accounts for them, to get access to all the Google Plus profiles. The reason the CIA is doing this is blatantly political in nature. It's using the students for intelligence gathering. They want to know what students know about the political issues of their respective countries, because they're going to use that information to aid in some type of attack.
