The vaccine consists of a protein that Pfizer's scientists say mimics a bite from the female Anopheles mosquito that carries malaria. The animal studies suggested the vaccine might be effective against the malaria parasite, and they tried to replicate that in human volunteers. Why would anyone think animal studies could serve as a reliable model for what happens in people? The human trial was designed to test whether the vaccine works in humans, not necessarily to determine whether the vaccine is safe. Okay, but what if the people in the Pfizer trial had known what would happen? Would they have volunteered? "It was designed to be within the rules and regulations of the ethical guidelines... so the participants of the trial didn't know what would happen," Mueller said. "There was a control group to determine if the vaccine was safe and people in the trial group were tested twice, so they didn't know what to expect." It's possible, if the vaccine had worked, that the people who took part in the trial would have volunteered. It's also possible that the vaccine didn't have an effect. "We don't know yet," Mueller said. "I can't say we did the vaccine because we don't know the results. It was a trial."2015 Ford Focus Vs. Hyundai Elantra GT 2016 Hybrid: Which One's Cheaper?
